THE DELIGHTS OF A HAREM.

Olive Harper, writing from Constan journed to the saloon, and girls came in to sing and dance. They brought their awk-ward lutes, and thrummed away at them and sung interminable songs in a monotonous man-ner that almost set me to sleep in spite of myself. Then four of them rose, and, throwing aside their jeridgees, began to dance, if dancing it can be called. They all wore trousers and slippers, and for bodices only a little sort of Spanish jacket that left nearly all the bust and stomach exposed down to the belt, being only held together by a button and loop. Their hair was braided and hanging down their backs and full of little jingling coins. Their motions and actions generally were to my way of thinking very indecorous, and I was glad when they had finished and took their leave, panting and flushed with their leadvieus postures and contections. Then the Pasha clapped his hande and four slaves came in and set up a large, white screen, and another came in with a little table, on which was a large-sized magic lantarm, to make what they call ombres Chinesses. I watched this with some curiosity, for I had heard that this was a favorite admissment with Turkish women. This was a pictorial drama. self. Then four of them rose, and, throwing to make what they call ombres Chiseisse. It watched this with some curiosity, for I had heard that this was a favorite anusement with Turkish women. This was a pictorial drama, it represented a woman and her many intrigues in due rotation, some of them being of a comic and some of a very serious character, wherein she seemed to bein great danger of discovery until the final result took place. She lost her head at last. Some of the pictures were the most indecent possible to imagine; but these women seemed to take the greatest delight in them, and to laugh with the most innocent pleasure. I did not dare to say a word against the arhibition there; but I didn't look at themexcept from behind my hands. That is the truth. After this enhibition was over I proposed to go home, and the Pasha then rose and reminded me that I must make a choice of some article in the house to take with me by way of a somewir. I objected, told him my memory of this day would serve to recall his family to mind, and much more of the same sort; but he told me if I had been well received there, and had no secret grievance against any of his family, I must take something, or that misfortune would certainly attend him and his. The women offered by dumb signs their jewels, but I was too good-natured to take that advantage. I looked about me in despair for some trifle, and at last I saw an odd-shaped black inkstand and stand-holder. I told the Pasha that, if he would permit, I would take that, as by that means I should always have his gift before my eyes. I had no somer stopped speaking thha I saw I had made a mistake. I believe I never opened my mouth yet without 'putting my foot in it.' The women all looked blank, and for a moment the Pasha was staggered. I hastened to retract, but it was too late, and I have the inkstand now. Going home, the Pasha sent his secretary and female slave with me, and from them I found out the value of the things. They are of black stone, set with coral and turquoise, and were made to order out of a piece of the pro cus sword.
